Mr. Logan got the floor and began to criticize the Democratic members who plead so earness by for their Southern brethern. They might be the brethern of those gratieness, but they were no brethern of those gratieness, but they were no brethern of these gratieness, but they were no brethern of his, (Applause.) Two Irishmen meeting on Ciposite Sides in the late war, the Union soldier asked the rebel why he was fighting on that side? "Arrah," said the rebel Irishman, "is not this the demonycratic side?" (Laughter.) He was afraid the gentleman from Brooklyn (Robinson) had not got beyond that yet. He maintained that the only way to reconstruct the rebel States was by military authority; and the only objection he had to the bill was that it did not declare that their State governments had been destroyed by themselves, did not remove every State-officer whether elected or appointed by Audreus foliation and place the States under military officers. Referring to Mr. Rodinson's allosion to General Grant for the next Presidency, he said be thought it a remarkable thing to find a gentleman who was a friend of Jefferson Davis also a friend of General Grant.

Mr. Elairidge suggested the name of Horace Greeley.
